What is a screening colonoscopy?

During a colonoscopy, your doctor places a small tube with a camera at the end of it in your large intestine. Your insurance plan asks that we use a number (an insurance code) when we send the bill to them. We use the code for a “screening colonoscopy” if we don’t find any small growths (polyps) during the screening. All insurance companies are required to pay for a screening colonoscopy. This was set up by President Obama with the Affordable Care Act (ACC), also known as “Obamacare.”

What is a polyp?

If growths are found, your doctor will try to take them out. These growths can grow to be cancerous if left in the colon. Once a growth is found and removed, the procedure is no longer called a screening colonoscopy. It is now called a “diagnostic” colonoscopy because the growth was found and removed. Treatment has taken place. This happens in about half of all screening colonoscopies that are done.

What does my insurance require?

If polyps are taken out, your insurance company requires that we use a different code to bill them. This may now mean that your insurance requires you to pay deductibles or a co-pay. It is best to call your health plan and ask what you may need to pay for if the code changes from a screening exam. Please let your doctor know if you have questions before your exam and what your health plan requires.
